Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER XXXIX Concluding Remarks. washington. --March 20. At Nashville, travelling north, one loses sight of the Cotton Belt, and the task I had set myself is now about accomplished. North Tennessee and Kentucky is a country of grains, grasses, and stock--of an undulating surface with good natural drainage, and elevated ridges often fantastical in shape--much more thinly wooded than the cotton region, an undergrowth of verdure gleaming brightly under the trees. There are considerable breadths of winter wheat, which, though said to be somewhat backward this season, is thriving in appearance, and gives a grateful aspect of cultivation and plenty to the land. A degree or two north of Nashville the difference of temperature is quite perceptible, and while the weather in the middle of March is genial and pleasant, the morning air is rawer, the sky more grey, and there is a colder...
