H E generous and anxious Montgomery found his impetuous friend impatiently attending his arrival. The moment he saw him he enquired eagerly for Victorine. * Have you not brought her? when shall I see her? where have you lest her? and why are you so late? were questions articulated without waiting for an answer to either. For heaven s fake, Chestei ville, said Montgomery, for heaven s fake be more calm and reasonable. You know best what reasons you have for wishing to keep your attachment to this young foreigner concealed from your father and your sister; if they are very forcible, is it possible you should not consider the probability there is of its being discovered if she comes higher? I did t I did wish indeed, replied Chesterville, I did with that my father might not know yet that I am married, because----- Married! exclaimed Montgomery, J are you married then? Yes, upon my soul I am; and I suppose you think I m a d--d fool for it. Not at all. If you loved Victorine (or what am I to call her ?) you did well to marry her; that is, if her character was such as brought no disgrace on you from the connection; but unless she has a fortune, I own I tremble at the effect which such intelligence may just now have on your fadier. Fortune? not a shilling. She is the natural daughter of...
